2. The training was for a period of four years. The school had six departments: navigation, engineering, marine engine construction, shipbuilding, port administration, and maritime law.

3. Three Poles were attending the school. The Poles received a grant of 800 rubles per month, whereas the Russian students were given only 350 to 400 rubles monthly, depending on the progress of their studies. The three Poles were training in the marine engine construction department. The standard of mathematics here was very high. All students paid for board out of their grants; the tuition itself was free.

4. Attendance at lectures and practical training was strictly supervised and checked.
When passing examinations, students had to obtain at least a "good" mark. If only a "pass" was awarded, the student had to undergo repeated examinations until he obtained a "good" mark.

5. There was no military training at the school and students were not subject to military discipline. The men mostly wore civilian clothes.
